No one denies America's right to lead the war on terror. It was the United States that was brutally attacked by terrorists, and it has the strongest military power. However President Bush and the American people should appreciate the efforts that have been made by the allies on America's behalf. Otherwise, the United States will be more isolated, and the American leadership will be progressively undermined by popular resentment in those countries which give so much and yet receive so little thanks. The America so quick to criticize must learn to praise.

6. English is indeed the new Latin. It has become a successor to the scholarly language once so powerful that many writers delayed publishing their books in hopes of translating them into Latin so as to obtain greater attention to the things. And there is a second way that English may parallel Latin. Latin outlived the Roman Empire, surviving long after the government that spread it through the world had vanished. The term “not worth a continental” became a popular reference to things of little value as a result of the inability of the government of the United States to pay for the Revolutionary War. Specifically, the federal government had no power to levy taxes that might transfer resources from the private sector to the public sector. To pay for needed weapons and soldiers, the federal government had only two other options, either borrow money or create new money. When loans proved to be inadequate, the Continental Congress started issuing new paper money—the “continental” dollar—in 1775. By the end of 1779, Congress had authorized issuance of over $250 million in Continental dollars. Fortunately, the war ended before the economy collapsed.

- ① The option of creating new money was not good for the economy.
- ② Two expenses of the Revolutionary War were taxes and loans.
- ③ Most of the money at that time was held by the public sector.
- ④ The federal government did not consider the option of loans.
- ⑤ The Continental dollars were of a great value.

In average American family, the children are ready to move out of the parents' house by the age of 18. They may go to college or they may seek a job. They might stay with their parents for another year or two, but after that they are expected to be on their own. Americans use the term 'empty nest syndrome' to refer to the psychological impact on the parents, particularly the mother, of the last child's departure from home. If the parents have long devoted major attention to their children and the children eventually leave, the parents confront a sort of vacuum in their lives. The 'empty nest syndrome' is a combination of boredom, depression, and feeling or purposelessness that afflicts parents who no longer have their children around them on a daily basis. As an antidote, many women, after their children leave, are entering or reentering the work-force or pursuing some social or political interest.

There was a study done of 286 children, newborns actually, to find out whether or not exposure to a dog actually protects them against allergies later in life, and, in fact, that's exactly what the study found. Thirty-three percent had allergies later on without the dog as a newborn; that's compared with 19 percent who had allergies with a dog. Now, researchers tried to figure out why this might be, and they deduced that perhaps when a newborn is exposed to a dog, it actually helps make some of the good parts of the immune system, those same sorts of cells that might actually help ward off allergies later in life.

Some factors of production-natural resources, human resources, and real capital goods-are (a)tangible resources. They have a physical existence that can be seen, touched, counted, measured, or weighed. In recent years, however, economists have become aware of intangible resources that also contribute to the production of goods and services. Entrepreneurship, for example, is really an intangible factor of production. (b)It is harder to see and measure, but we know that it is important by the effect that it has. Two societies, for example, might have the same physical amounts of tangible resources, but one society might be able to produce more with these factors of production because it has (c)a greater capacity for entrepreneurship.

In recent years, many economists have emphasized knowledge as still another factor of production. (d)Scientific and other knowledge can indeed contribute to improving productive resources. For example, (e)technological knowledge may be used to make better capital goods and thereby increase the productivity of real capital.

16. It is not always simple to draw a clear distinction between music and noise. In fact, music to my ears may be noise to yours. There are certain totally disagreeable sounds around us, for example, a jet airplane taking off or the scrape of fingernails on a blackboard. But they are few and far between. In most cases, the line drawn between music and noise is subjective. For a thirteen-year-old girl, a rock music might be majestic music. Her parents would not necessarily agree. How about the squeaking of the beginner's violin? It is sweet music to the proud parents who see the makings of a future great violinist, but the neighbor might regard it as noise.

Seventy-five million pieces of mail can end up in the dead mail office in one year. The disposition of this “dead mail” is a big problem for the dead mail offices. Since shoes are meant to protect the feet, it's hard to believe that some styles have made walking nearly impossible. In ancient China, it was the custom to bind the feet of upper-class girls so that when they became women they could squeeze their small feet into silk shoes only four inches long. The binding process involved bending the toes under the feet, which were bound with tight wrappings worn day and night until the feet stopped growing. According to legend, the practice started when a royal princess was born with very small, deformed feet. To save her from embarrassment in later years, it was decided that no lady of the court would be considered truly noble unless she had feet as tiny as the princess.

fog or be precipitated in dry forms. In fact, although the term "acid rain" has been in use for more than a century, it is derived from atmospheric studies that were made in the region of Manchester, England. The more accurate scientific term would be "acid deposition." The dry form of such precipitation is just as damaging to the environment as the liquid form.

The problem of acid rain originated with the Industrial Revolution, and it has been growing ever since. The severity of its effects has long been recognized in local settings, as exemplified by the spells of acid smog in heavily industrialized area. The widespread destructiveness of acid rain, however, has become evident only in recent decades. One large area that has been studied extensively is northern Europe, where acid rain has eroded structures, injured crops and forests, and threatened or depleted life in freshwater lakes. Industrial emissions have been blamed as the major cause of acid rain. Because the chemical reactions involved in the production of acid rain in the atmosphere are complex and as yet little understood, industries have tended to challenge such assessments and to stress the need for further studies; and because of the cost of pollution reduction, governments have tended to support this attitude.

Growth in most economies is very much dependent upon imports and the ability to export in order to pay for imports. The fact that some economies recovered relatively quickly from world War II and grew much more rapidly in the postwar period than others has stimulated a great deal of comparative analysis in growth theory. Economists have pointed to the periodic balance of payments crises experienced by Britain and the lack of such crises in Germany. During a boom, as incomes rise, the demand for imports will rise also as a natural feature of prosperity. But if exports do not also rise at the same time, the authorities may be forced to take fiscal or monetary counter-measures and slow down the economy in an effort to bring imports and exports back into balance.
